The role of chemokines in the pathogenesis of acute graft-versus-host disease. Both recipient and donor dendritic cells (DCs) are involved in acute graft-versus-host disease (aGVHD), but the contribution of these cells to aGVHD remains largely unknown. We performed a microarray analysis of gene expression in skin and livers from recipient mice that develop aGVHD in syngeneic bone marrow transplant (BMT) and xenogeneic BMT. Transplantation of donor BM cells into lethally irradiated mice resulted in different gene expression patterns depending on the allogeneic combinations used. Skin grafts from recipients of allogeneic donor BMT exhibited a unique expression pattern for chemokines, when compared to those from syngeneic BMT, indicating differential in vivo development of chemokine-producing cells. Furthermore, expression of chemokines by donor DCs in primary mixed lymphocyte reaction may be an early event in aGVHD pathogenesis. Our results suggest that infiltration of chemokine-producing cells into the graft, and/or interactions between host and donor cells may play important roles in the pathogenesis of aGVHD.
