I've also tried: looking for free/royalty free music for my podcast looking for free/royalty free music for background ambiences looking for free/royalty free music with vocals A: The word "derivative" is usually not a problem in music, especially if you can produce a song that does not sound too much like what made the original "hit". This is a de facto policy of the music industry to reward people who hit with ideas of other songs instead of re-copying other people's ideas. This is especially the case with a very successful song that has been "sampled" many times over by different artists (think, say, the hook on Rihanna's "Umbrella", which is an exact copy of the hook of Wham's "Wake Me Up Before You Go-Go", but also sampled in many other songs, including Beyonce's "Single Ladies", Adele's "Rolling In The Deep" or Linkin Park's "In The End"). However, if the new song sounds too much like the original song, it can be a problem for you, and it may be better to work from a track that's more original and work your lyrics and hooks around that. As for "free", this mostly applies to the idea of copyright and IP laws, and not so much to music. However, most people who are involved in producing and writing music understand the need to have a bit of money to be able to pay their employees, rent offices, equipment and buy more boxes of wine and cookies to celebrate another day of hard work. This is completely necessary to be able to produce or write music, and most musicians, producers, and songwriters feel it's better to have the few necessary funds needed than to not have them. Most people who work at record labels and the music industry understand the need to pay royalties and reap the rewards of their work as well, and in general they want to make as much money as possible, but at the same time, they understand that they are "secondary source", meaning their songs are heard by millions of people, and they do not want to copy a hit song without compensating the right people for their work. And this is by far not the only reason why people work in the music industry. And the reason that it's important to pay royalties to musicians is that their work helps society, it helps maintain the culture, it helps the economy, and it helps fund a higher
