The Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas hosted a national economic forum, "U.S. Economy: 4.0 or Bust?," on Thursday, featuring speakers from several major economic think tanks on what the U.S. needs to do to achieve a 4 percent gross domestic product growth rate, as mandated by the nation's debt ceiling, and which is also set as the Fed's target growth rate. Charles F. Kolstad, an economist at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, told CNBC that the country needs to get spending under control and resolve the deficit. "[The] U.S. will have a 4 percent growth rate, we just can't afford it if we're going to have the fiscal problems that we have," Kolstad said. "There has to be a set of choices about how we go about achieving growth, and one of the choices is we need to get fiscal policy under control." Kolstad estimated that the U.S. needs to cut government spending by $2 trillion, adding that it will take a "long time" to get the economy to grow again at a 4 percent rate. "We're not going to get 4 percent growth without cutting government," Kolstad said. "It's going to take a long time to get there, so it's time to start cutting." Paul A. Volcker, chairman of the Independent Community Bankers of America, said it is imperative for the Fed to follow the Constitution and its role in the "representative government" and be "neutral in banking affairs." "What the Fed does is to keep the money supply of money fluid, and that's its function," Volcker told CNBC. "It's not a political body. It's a backstop for the government and so it should be kept nonpolitical." Doug Holtz-Eakin, director of the Congressional Budget Office, told CNBC that the country needs "fair
