Person's, People, People Information The collection is named after the state of Massachusetts which is the home state of one of the main writers and developers behind the application. Versions The application comes in three versions, each of them having different licenses, permissions, and features. For some time, both in the United States and abroad, there has been considerable interest in developing improved methods of locating and identifying the remains of persons buried in the ground. A particular problem in this regard is the search for the burial location of a previously unidentified person. It is generally accepted that gravesites of persons who have died unknown to the community are more frequently than not, commingled with the gravesites of others. The numbers of such unknown gravesites is staggering. In fact, estimates indicate that of the 400,000,000 gravesites in the United States alone, the number of unknown gravesites is at least two-hundred million. While the present invention may have other applications, it has particular application in the search for the unknown grave of an individual. The invention provides a means for the unambiguous identification of a buried body by taking a series of soil samples. The samples are analyzed to detect and determine the distribution and pattern of various substances which are found in soil at different depths. The United States Army has been conducting extensive testing of various methods and means for detecting the location of buried bodies. The Army has previously tested various techniques of ground sensing by means of various devices. Ground sensing is that method of locating a buried body in which a signal is transmitted into the ground through a buried wire, cable or the like. In such techniques, an instrument is positioned over the location of a buried wire, cable or the like. The instrument detects the reflected energy from the buried wire, cable or the like, and through complex calculations produces an accurate location of the buried wire, cable or the like. In the United States, the methods and means previously used by the Army for ground sensing have been based on the use of buried wires or cables of metal conductors having a high resistance to the transmission of currents therethrough. These systems used the sensing of the ground through the flow of a current through the conductor which was affected by the proximity of the buried wire, cable or the like.
