Mammon is a free cryptocurrency wallet and market app that helps you to keep track of your cryptocoins. The PC gaming market is heating up with the launch of new cryptocurrency mining software. The trend is stemming from the introduction of Nvidia's new graphics cards, which allow for greater hardware efficiency in solving cryptographic problems. Some companies are also offering exclusive GPU cards that are specifically designed to cater to Bitcoin mining users. The upshot is that mining is now accessible for everyone without the need for specialized equipment. According to the industry analyst, "There is a fundamental shift happening, which means that the cost of mining will continue to decline." The current prices are still significantly higher than what is feasible for most individuals. However, this does not mean that the rise in popularity of mining is here to stay. Many cryptocurrency enthusiasts are concerned that the activity could be siphoning off computing power from other uses and they are right to worry. By distributing computing power throughout the network, Bitcoin mining is a double-edged sword. While some argue that this is an investment opportunity, others criticize the practice as it does not directly benefit end-users, but rather the miners. The new trend may become a legal concern for the PC gaming industry as it could discourage the use of older graphics cards. Unlike the old Bitcoin mining paradigm, which required specialized hardware, new tools do not necessarily have to be pricey. For example, Nvidia's software is designed to be compatible with graphics cards ranging from the GTX 1060 all the way up to the GTX 1080, and the miners are not limited to Nvidia's range. The selection of cards is virtually limitless, which means that the mining trend will not be limited to its current participants. Cryptocurrency Mining Software The software is designed to make it simple to get started with cryptocurrency mining. It can be downloaded and installed onto Windows or Mac computers, and the process is straightforward. The company claims that the software runs on both macOS and Windows, and it can be customized to work with any graphics card. In fact, the default settings are built to be compatible with all graphic cards ranging from the GTX 1060 all the way up to the GTX 1080. Mining operations are based on the Bitcoin network, but the app is designed to integrate with other networks such as Ethereum, Ethereum Classic, Dash, Litecoin and Ripple. Each network has its own special features, and their protocol and technical specifications are also different from Bitcoin. There are also
