Intersystem communication In a large system architecture, there will be a collection of subsystems. Each of them have one core. Communication and centralized management are out of question. There is only one master that can access all the other systems. I would like to avoid the situation where all the other systems are waiting for the core to do the work. I would like to have an asynchronous scenario, i.e. all the cores to do the work as soon as they have work, and the master to only keep track of the progress of the different cores. This is what I need to avoid: I can use a shared memory queue (e.g. an std::deque) to send all the cores their work. But the "master" may not be aware of the central queue. I can use locks on the same location. This would be a centralized location and they would all be synchronized together. No lock synchronization is needed between the cores. Is it a good design choice? Is there any other design? A: I've seen one common practice where each subsystem is a different core and each subsystem has it's own memory manager. One master core would only know about the memory pool, and threads were spawned from the pools. That way you could know that the thread wouldn't even notice that its subsystem's memory pool wasn't updated. Alternatively, you could have a core per pool with the pool managers own manager. That way, a single thread could be spawning cores without needing any synchronization. The actual management could then look something like this: master_thread // Main
