He spoke about the need to strengthen the existing cooperation with the US in public safety, about education, and more. It's worth watching. The speech is also being received in the US as a sign of Obama's intention to step up to the plate and start making nice with Latin America again. His election team has been working on a plan to roll out the red carpet. But it's kind of hard for the US press to praise the speech without denouncing the president's political opponents. It's a lousy thing to do, but I don't think the US press gave the speech a fair shake, and their remarks aren't really representative of other viewpoints. There's a bunch of comments from conservative voices or, better yet, from Breitbart and other conservative blogs. But I think there were a few legitimate criticisms of the president's speech, and they were fairly well covered in the print press, though I don't think they were covered nearly enough on television. They were this: first, that he was "snakey" for giving cover to the Mexican police who tortured and killed the three students (losing the original tape of the Zapata Villa murder.) This may seem like a small criticism, but it reveals a deep lack of understanding of how Washington works. The US government is not just a government of laws, but also a government that relies on the prerogatives of the executive, and the power of the bully pulpit. The Mexican president spoke to the people, not just to the press, and the entire world listened to him. The power of the media is not absolute, although it is certainly greater in the US than anywhere else in the world. But the Mexican president has neither the press, nor the voter, nor the

Most of the files we provide are tested, we provide virus and adware free files.The present invention relates to a light source for optical communications having an effective emitting bandwidth of about 3.6 GHZ and a bandwidth product of about 12 GHZ or higher and, more particularly, to a light source having an integrated seed laser cavity which uses a semiconductor material such as a distributed Bragg reflector (DBR). For the production of distributed feedback (DFB) semiconductor lasers and distributed Bragg reflectors (DBR) semiconductor lasers, the use of glass wafers for the fabrication of the semiconductor components is disadvantageous in view of the costs of the device. Typically, only about ten to forty substrates are needed for the manufacture of a single production lot. Glass substrates are moreover susceptible to damage due to wafer warping and other deformation. In order to fabricate the high-power semiconductor laser components, semiconductor materials such as AlGaAs and GaAsP are preferably used. Especially for high-power and short-wavelength lasers, semiconductor materials of AlGaAs are preferably used. Such semiconductor materials however, have a limited band gap of less
