Areia: Pathway to Dawn takes place in a mystical world that has long since become corrupt as a result of the misuse of mysticism and magic. It is your duty to make an effort to investigate and reveal the true nature of the world. Your goal is to use a collection of objects that will help you clear the world and reach a new state of order, and with that, achieve the world's "blessed equilibrium." The magical and mystical atmosphere in Areia is truly impressive, with a base that is as lighthearted and funky as it is intricate and inspiring. As you clear the world, you are faced with various riddles and puzzles. To solve them, you need to acquire a specific and rare object that is scattered throughout the land. Once you discover all the objects, the world is cleared for the new order. And as if this wasn't enough to complete the game, there are times where you will need to unveil the secrets of the world, and that is where the addition of a light and soothing soundtrack that complements the journey come into play. Q: Avoid calling multiple constructors in the same program I'm attempting to create a class where the constructor takes in an array of objects. In some instances, I want to create a new object and fill it with data. In other instances, I want to create an object and fill it with the input of the constructor. But in doing so, my constructor is called multiple times in the same program. I tried this, but it seems to be doing nothing:

public class Employee implements Serializable{ private String employeeID;
private int hoursWorked; private double wage; Employee(String newEmployeeID, int newHoursWorked, double newWage){ employeeID = newEmployeeID; hoursWorked = newHoursWorked; wage = newWage; } Employee(int newEmployeeID, int newHoursWorked, double newWage){ employeeID = newEmployeeID;
hoursWorked = newHoursWorked; wage =

newWage; } Employee(int newEmployeeID, int newHoursWorked){ employeeID = newEmployeeID;
hoursWorked = newHoursWorked; } Employee(String newEmployeeID){ employeeID = newEmployeeID; } Employee

As the country struggles to grapple with the hardships of life after Colby College and the abrupt closure of an institution that educates more than 3,500 undergraduates and has since 1812, news out of Boston College has rocked the Jesuit community and beyond. Recognized nationally for its rigorous coursework and challenging curricula, BC's NCAA Division I program and its 31 academic departments garner more awards and distinctions than any other higher education institution in the country. BC has educated students who served in Congress and in many cases, won the coveted Rhodes Scholarship. A handful have gone on to make history themselves at the United States Supreme Court. BC and its students have put Boston firmly on the map. With all of these accomplishments, how could one college crumble? And how could a school that is bigger, bolder, more visible and nationally recognized risk such a tragic end?
