»Good game, not much new content, good easy gameplay. Very fun when playing it online. The browser version really sucks since the game won't even let you have more than 4 pages of an item. shakes fist at Adobe =/. On the Mac, at least, you can drag the browser window up so you can look the numbers up without having to click right

What's new:

Second Galaxy is a science fiction role-playing game by Palladium Books published in 2002. It includes an opus of setting information and alternate history rules, along with a book of expanded character generation rules for use in Palladium's other games, as well as a comprehensive setting handbook called Atlantis Rising. It is set in the Palladium Universe, a shared universe in which Palladium's games and settings are all set. The Second Galaxy system is a 3d6 (3D6+V) system which uses "skills" instead of attributes or skills. The game is focused on character advancement and character creation, with combat and combat resolution handled with a resource called "Kinesis Points" (KP). Like Palladium's previous Third Edition game, Rifts, Second Galaxy was designed for use in conjunction with the Rifts setting books, but unlike Rifts, Second Galaxy was left uncensored and any official church characters present in Rifts or Legacy are allowed to be present in Second Galaxy as well. Summary Instead of characters being assigned a set number of skills, a character has three main skills. The character must have a Base Point of each skill and an Attribute point (AP), and receive a skill point from a Skill Seeker each time they level-up (called "Leveling Up"). Each level of skill requires at least one KP to level. The AP/KP system drastically simplifies character creation, but creates problems for power gaming. Second Galaxy is designed around a three dimensional role-playing experience with emphasis on detailed combat and the development of characters. Each character has six stats (Intelligence, Offense, Defense, Strength, Agility, and Knowledge), a skill check base known as a "SUBSKILL" (this is the 4th skill on the character sheet), and a set of three core skills known as a "CHIROPRACTIC" (attached to the Intelligence skill, SUBSKILL, and AP). The SUBSKILL is modified by the character's Skills, reflecting their particular specialty or what they are trained in. Characters have only two Defense potentials - Force (Block, Deflect, Dodge, Reflexes, and Parry) and Physical Resistance (Exo-Skeletal, Sleep, Sleepers, Venom, etc.). Characters make attack rolls and have a defense of Natural Defense determined by the character's Intelligence. Damage that cannot be deflected or absorbed by

Molecular and behavioral development of the monogastric target organ. There is a close parallel between the morphological changes and molecular and behavioral changes underlying postnatal growth of food-receptive tissues. As an example the temporal occurrence of two of the first postnatal taste-related events, the switch from salt to non-nutritive sweet taste, and the onset of suckling, are quantified for all four classes of milk-receptive tissues: olfactory epithelium, fungiform papillae, vallate papillae and sublingual taste buds. In contrast to the high timing precision of stage-specific phenotype changes in the central nervous system these moment-to-moment, hormone-driven events, at the level of the entire system, provide the trigger for the coordinated behavioral development of the gastric target organ. The fetus is able to perceive, identify and map oral taste stimuli, and analyze the geometric organization of fungiform papillae and taste buds in their fetomaxillofacial complex (unblinded animal) from 6 to 12 weeks of gestation. Within 8 weeks of parturition and the birth of the first offspring, the sensitivity of the developing salivary and nasal taste-sensitive system
