Structural characteristics of in vivo and in vitro produced triiodothyronine in domestic fowl. To understand the molecular mechanisms of deiodination of T3 to reverse-T3 (rT3), the in vivo and in vitro metabolism of T3 were compared using nuclear T3-sulfation as an index of T3 deiodination. In vivo studies revealed that the sulfated fraction was higher (P less than 0.01) in immature chickens (0.52 +/- 0.04%) than in adults (0.11 +/- 0.02%), while in vitro studies revealed that sulfated fraction was lower (P less than 0.05) in liver and kidney homogenates from immature chickens (0.11 +/- 0.02 to 0.34 +/- 0.03%) than in those from adults (0.65 +/- 0.08 to 0.92 +/- 0.07%) and in chicks (1.35 +/- 0.11 to 1.45 +/- 0.06%). Sulfation was linear in cultured chick embryo liver cells. Analytical studies showed that T3 sulfation in vivo was dose dependent at levels of 10-1,000 ng/100 g body wt and that the sulfation in vitro was linear at levels of 10-1,000 ng/100 g body wt. The factors accounting for the decrease in sulfation in younger chickens were further studied. The results suggested that the reduction in sulfation was due to a reduction in the number of hepatic alpha-monodeiodinase enzyme molecules rather than a change in the affinity of the enzyme for T3.Q: VB.NET and NAudio I'm trying to use this library with VB.NET. A new study reports that women who received an economic intervention to reduce the number of cigarettes they smoked were twice as likely to enter a smoking cessation program as women who received a placebo. While a study was conducted in Brazil, the behavioral economics behind it is universal, and could prove beneficial in similar scenarios. The new research involved a team of United States and Brazilian researchers who worked together to explore how contextual factors and social norms in a person's environment can affect behavior in order to influence quality of life. To begin their research, the team involved 72 smokers in a double-blinded study where they were randomly assigned to either a treatment group, a placebo control group, or a no-treatment group. Participants in the treatment group received vouchers for cigarettes that they could redeem at a tobacco store. The subjects then had to choose whether to use the voucher to reduce their number of daily cigarettes or not. Those in the placebo control group did not receive any economic intervention. With this design in mind, the team conducted a series of focus groups with the participants before and after they received the treatment. The researchers found that individuals who received the economic intervention were more likely to use the voucher towards reducing the number of cigarettes they smoked. They noted that they had observed a cultural shift in Brazil regarding smoking. There has been a complete shift towards more health promoting attitudes, and this shift had affected the smoking population negatively. The patients that did not receive treatment were either smoking because of low income or because of a desire to appear successful. In contrast, the participants who were given the economic intervention were most likely to use the vouchers towards reducing their cigarette consumption. The study concluded that the overall goal was to explore contextual factors and social norms that have the ability to help or hinder an individual's level of commitment to smoking cessation.
