Comparative studies were carried out to investigate the use of cultures of mouse peritoneal cells as an in vitro assay for measuring the induction of exogenous cells by the putative lymphocyte growth factors of phytohemagglutinin and bacterial lipopolysaccharide. Mouse cells obtained from animals as young as 3 days old produced high levels of transformation, which increased with age. The relative effectiveness of the stimulatory agents increased with age with the thymocytes as the most sensitive cells, the spleen cells as the least sensitive cells, and the peritoneal cells as intermediate cells. The results of stimulation by the two agents differed somewhat, the splenic cells in a primary stimulation response (2×10^5 cells/well), being more sensitive to lipopolysaccharide (5000 cpm/well) than to phytohemagglutinin (5000 cpm/well). In contrast, the peritoneal cells (10^5 cells/well) were more sensitive to phytohemagglutinin than lipopolysaccharide. It is suggested that the higher levels of transformation induced by phytohemagglutinin in peritoneal cells may result from positive selection of a subset of cells with a high reactivity to the mitogen. The role of physiological, psychological and environmental influences in muscle structure and function is reviewed. Physiological influences include macromolecular composition and biochemistry of muscle proteins, conditions of metabolism, hydration and distribution of muscle water, collagen, glycosaminoglycan and soluble muscle protein content. Psychological influences include muscle activity, intensity and duration, as well as sensory conditions and motivation. Environmental influences include physical training, nutritional status, overtraining, disuse and reduced activity. In the case of humans, normal and physical fatigue can be minimized if hormonal, nutritional and metabolic factors are closely monitored. Relative disuse of a muscle may be overcome if there is enough time for adaptation to be adequate.Fire Services Fire Services Many residents know that Cooksland Fire Company responds to carbon monoxide (CO) alarms and fire alarms that go off in their homes.
