What's new:

Motte Island (also called Motte Island Group) is the longest submarine mountain in the globe. It is located at the Weddell Sea, far south of Antarctica, east of continental Antarctica, about from the tip of the Antarctic Peninsula. It is the highest mountain of continent Antarctica. Most of the shores of Weddell Sea are characterised by steep cliffs up to high, forcing the currents of Weddell Sea to flow along the cliffs. The largest of the islands is Motte Island,, composed of several geographic features. These are the coastal cliffs, the island slopes, the waterfalls, the fjord, the high columnar basalt cliffs (Motte Group), and the post-glacial moraine. Geography Motte Islands form one of the most remarkable geological formations in the Southern Ocean. It was discovered in 1841 on account of "the position of its summits, its strange forms, the application of its cliffs to the most violent weather, the depth of its abysses, its width, which compresses the waters into a thousand contrasts of bright and stormy light and dark shadow". The Scottish geologist Robert Brown discovered it when exploring Antarctica for the Weddell Sea Expedition. Near the Isle of Rousay, Scotland, he called Motte Island "a lofty and conical island with a fathom of cliff." Larger islets surround the largest one, Motte-point or Derwent Island (31.5 km², 1,211 m high), which rises above sea level, and is the highest mountain on the Antarctic continent, including the Antarctic ice sheet. The South-eastern edge of the Motte Group consists of huge submarine cliffs, up to high. The steepest drop to the Weddell Sea is about or more. The absolute depths in the surrounding sea exceed 10,000 m; there are electric impulses which can be felt at depths of more than. At the moment, no motors are capable of moving under the sea, so the existence of this polarity must be considered highly speculative. The cliffs are formed of columnar basalt, of Cretaceous age. The basalt type of bedrock is quite common in the shore area of the Antarctic Plateau, but it occurs here with overwhelming amount of basalt predominating. The basalt is a volcanic rock, which is locally best developed in Swiss, Italian and Greek Paleogene calcare
