any answer. I feel rather silly now, but think that the only solution is to compromise between the Discussion in 'Initial D' started by yanase, Jan 4, 2011.Q: Asynchronous refreshing of RSS Feeds (with varying intervals) I have the following requirements: A user can add a certain number of RSS feeds to his or her Subversion Repository. Those feeds need to be automatically refreshed on a regular (or at least well-defined) interval, in order to check if and when there have been changes. What would be a good strategy for doing this? I can think of a couple of approaches, but am not sure which one would best fit the situation. The first approach is to just use the SVN command `svn update` to update the feeds whenever a commit is committed to the repository. This requires the user to manually intervene in order to do the initial update, but it also solves the problem of automatically updating the feeds. Another approach would be to have a script run on a specified interval, fetch all feeds, and do a `svn update` on them. The drawback of this approach is that I could never guarantee that all the feeds will be updated. The other drawback, of course, would be that the update command will block the script until the update has finished. Is there a third approach? A: The time complexity of 'svn update' will not fit your needs. 'update' has to run through the entire working directory, checking it out against the repository, for every path it should check. Let's say your working directory has 400,000 items, including your feeds.
