Cannabinoid receptor-1 and -2 (CB1 and CB2) receptors are expressed in the nervous system, immune system and the cardiovascular system and participate in the immune response as well as in the control of pain, endocrine function and inflammation. In the preclinical experimental models, the main mechanisms which explain the antinociceptive properties of cannabinoids are still poorly understood. In contrast, clinical studies in humans have revealed that the administration of cannabinoid agonists results in decreased inflammatory and neuropathic pain, allodynia and hyperesthesia. The antinociceptive effect of cannabinoids is rapid, persistent and relatively receptor-specific. Furthermore, a powerful and direct antinociceptive effect has been demonstrated in specific models of acute and/or neuropathic pain in rodents. The main target tissues of endogenous cannabinoids are diffusely distributed in the nervous system but a number of reports have also revealed that several peripheral tissues can express CB1 receptors. The observations that the inhaled anandamide and the enteroendocrine cannabinoid-releasing peptides (ECRP) are effective in the treatment of inflammatory pain suggest that the ECRP may be mediators of the endogenous cannabinoid system. Nevertheless, the possibility that other endogenous compounds and/or their metabolites may display a similar profile should not be ruled out.
