Bioactive ceramics in bone repair with the application of bi-functional ions: effects of Sr and Zn. The interference of bi-functional ions in bone repair is a growing concern in the last decade, due to their important and controversial effects; whereas, little is known about the consequences that bi-functional ions can have on these processes. Considering the presence of strontium (Sr) and zinc (Zn) cations in the mineral phase of bone and the potential actions mediated by their free ions as osteoinduction or osteosclerosis agents, it is of paramount importance to analyze their real potential effects in vivo, as well as to elucidate the most prominent molecular mechanisms underlying their action within the osteoprogenitor cells. In this work, the osteoconductive effect of bioactive ceramics with or without ions Sr and Zn was analyzed in an animal model of severe bone defects. The results demonstrate that the calcium phosphate bioactive ceramics, in the presence of ions Sr and Zn, exhibited a similar osteoconductive effect in tissues when compared with groups without ions; nonetheless, the absence of ions (e.g. free Zn) did not cause significant differences. In the bone area around implants, the osteoid intensity was highest in some of the groups with the highest concentrations of ions, and the analysis of the expression of osteoinductive genes Osterix (Osx) and Runt-related transcription factor 2 (Runx2) indicated a differential effect regarding the control. Additionally, genes regulating adhesion (Laminin alpha1 and alpha4) and the differentiation of mesenchymal cells (bone morphogenetic protein and connective tissue growth factor) varied in intensity depending on the concentration of strontium and zinc.
