Q: How to handle on-going (JOB) process with React-Native? I've been working on an app which need to authenticate and obtain a token from (a) remote service, and I'm using react native with Expo. The problem is that when the app starts it begins a process and it doesn't end before the user logs out. Now my question is... when the process ends, do I need to call my API again to obtain a new token? Or can I store the token in the user's device? Is there any way to prevent an app from starting a process and ending it before the user logs in? I would really appreciate your help! A: Don't worry about the process start and finish. Just make sure to make it into background. If you are using any kind of third party library, you can use the npm module spawn to spawn the background process in the background. from the official docs: Creates a new child process. Invokes the callback function for when the child process exits Usage: const spawn = require('react-native-spawn'); var process = spawn('./node_modules/yarn/bin/yarn.js', ['run', 'gitlab'], { stdio: 'inherit' }); spawn.on('message', (data) => { //do your stuff here process.kill(); }) This way you can track when your process finish, just make sure to send back some acknowledgement to the parent. Or you can use the Expo Background Processing API to handle background jobs for you. An off-season program is in place, as well as training camps for the 2017 NFL season. While a number of things can happen from training camp, one of the most critical pieces of the puzzle will be figuring out what QBs will be starting on opening day. A big part of the job for the quarterback is to make sure he has the confidence of his own coach as well as the offensive staff. Even though in some instances the quarterback might report a bit early, it's best if he leaves as a free agent. Here are some QBs I am most looking forward to seeing in action next season. Jimmy Garoppolo, New England Patriots Garoppolo is as good a case as there is. He
