The Games of the Ancients, or 'Battles of the Ancient World', are a series of highly realistic wargames that simulate some of the greatest battles of history. The games cover various periods from the Stone Age to the Age of the Crusades. Each scenario depicts a battle between two armies that fought at the time period indicated. All the game systems are time sensitive and units are destroyed if they are not moved immediately. Each side has a unique and very distinct role, so there is a lot to do, a lot to command, and a lot to do some thinking about to win. Players will need to use their brain as well as their hands, as the battles have been carefully designed to emulate actual historical battles. Each battle has its own set of unique rules, but we strongly recommend that gamers familiarise themselves with the basic concepts before starting a scenario. Motion vision has been a challenge for researchers for many years due to complications of development and the absence of intact embryonic or larval preparations. We have been successful in preparing and evaluating models for the study of visual function of the developing mammalian retina using the leech as a primary preparation. These models have been shown to provide a useful experimental model for the basic science of retinal development and the visual system which will be explored in this proposal. In this proposal, we will use the leech preparation as a model system to investigate the developmental processes that lead to maturation of spatial sensitivity in transverse patterns of cells in leech retinotectal (IRt) pathway. We will study the changes in sensitivities to various spatial frequency (SF) patterns of retinal cells in order to determine the developmental roles of the morphological changes seen in retinal cells during their differentiation into retinotectal pathway cells. We have already begun to demonstrate that some cells in the retina or pathway decussate to reach the contralateral side of the animal through the optic nerve. We will investigate the role of these parallel circuits in the development of retinotectal pathway cells in terms of flow of information into the optic nerve. We will also monitor the development of excitability of tectal neurons during tectal growth. We also plan to use these preparations to study the roles of the different retinal cells in visual processing, i.e. determination of their functional properties. This information will be combined with data on the neural development of the leech using isomorph and isoform analyses to develop a model of leech retinal development. We have already shown that one isoform of a particular calcium binding

The Meyers court concluded that CIT intended to “ensure the navigation of its products,” and was “a necessary accident or malfunctioning of the product to trigger the relevant warranty.” Id. at 1244. In contrast, the district court found that CIT was a third party that might be the likely cause of the accident. We agree with the district court that CIT was not an intended user of Pilkington’s Polypropylene, and that CIT was not involved in the ultimate cause of the accident.⁵ Based on the language of the contract, we conclude that CIT is not an intended user of the Polypropylene. The contract addresses primarily the intended use of the Polypropylene, not any instructions for installation or use by CIT. Article 5.2 says that “the Seller is a manufacturer of specified Polypropylene.” (emphasis added). It is undisputed that CIT was not a manufacturer.⁶ CIT was not CIT’s own purchaser of the 5 The court considered the fact that American Ship and Tackle was not in privity of contract with CIT. Id. at 1241. ⁶ According to Navigators Technical Services, Inc., CIT is a broker of ship related business. Navigators 12 products, but rather Pilkington itself was the manufacturer. Article 7.1 says that “the Seller shall be a manufacturer and the Buyer shall be a user.” That reference to “user” and “user’s” does not express CIT’s intended use of the Polypropylene. The dictionary definition of “user” is “[
