Infiltrating colon cancer is a common cancer with unfavorable prognosis. We previously reported that a VNRCC-associated reduced-volume cytotoxic chemotherapy is a good regimen for infiltrating colon cancer. The aim of this study was to re-evaluate the short-term outcome of the reduced-volume chemotherapy. The subjects were 100 patients who had undergone the reduced-volume cytotoxic chemotherapy for infiltrating colon cancer. They were divided into the partial response (PR) and stable disease (SD) groups. The chemotherapy in the PR group significantly improved short-term outcomes compared to that in the SD group. They improved the overall survival and disease-free survival. Chemotherapy with a reduced-volume regimen had good efficacy and possibly has a large survival benefit in the patients with infiltrating colon cancer. The data also suggest an under-evaluation of the short-term outcome of infiltrating colon cancer in medical practice.Q: What should I do to programmable function?
